HOW DOES AN ARTIST'S TECHNIQUE & STYLE CONTRIBUTE TO THE EMOTIVE POWER OF THEIR PORTRAITURE?

STATEMENT OF INTENT

After watching Anh Do's Anh's Brush with Fame series, I became interested in his interpretive and expressionist portraiture which evokes raw emotion to a higher level than that of photorealistic painting techniques. This visual study will explore the way in which artists manipulate painting techniques and styles to project their own and their sitters' expressions, and how this provides insight into subjective human emotions.

Portraiture was the historical photograph. Painter was eye level with subject, with limited colours and lighting. The purpose was to reflect wealth not emotion.

Photoshop 'dry brush' filter and dramatic highlighting has allowed recreation of timeless photographic painting technique/composition.

The revolution of romanticism in literature encouraged emotional artistic expression of psychological states rather than recording individual likeness.

Unrestricted poses and body language exposes more human nature.

Breadth of warm colours develop whimsical atmosphere.

Clothing encourages movement and freedom. Floral background symbolises gentleness.

BERTHE MORISOT

~ HOW DID MORISOT USE IMPRESSIONIST TECHNIQUES TO EVOKE EMOTION ?

1841 - 1895

Female impressionist, Morisot uses loose brush strokes to express an elegant perception of her life/place in the world focusing on maternal themes.

Classicism parallels

- Stationary posing
- Subject matter
- Analysis of human form

Romanticism parallels

- Emotive facial expression
- Romantic/whimsical mood
- Soft yet energetic technique creates movement

The 'father of expressionism's' timeline of self-portraits mirrors emotional/psychological state represented by differing amounts of realism, colour choices and brush directions. Depression, anxiety and bipolar-disorder ended his short 37-years. Art was an outlet for his 'madness.'

Kokoschka's impasto layering, broad strokes and wide contrasting colour range creates emotive depth. Hectic technique alludes conversational interaction and relationships.

By simplifying Shiele's exaggerated, rough technique, my sketch is less powerful which indicates the importance of his varying textures, vivid tones and unnatural positioning of his subjects.

Juxtaposition of colour and texture creates conflict between undirected strokes. Rigid strokes reflect anger that he translates onto his canvas, puncturing holes in his canvases.

Abstract expressive distorted and dynamic yet aggressive idolisation of the female figure. He blends the figure with the background to assert her fearful feminine power.

Therefore, emotion is developed in approach to painting and the specific technique process.

Drawing from life with restricted time captures more movement than photographs.

Monochromatic is blunter and less energetic than colour.

Different emotional capabilities. Similar rigid strokes from charcoal and paint creates vague form. Different relationship with negative space, projects more abstraction but less technical anger.

"I'm not interested in 'abstracting' or taking things out or reducing painting to design, form, line and colour. I paint this way because I can keep putting more things in it - drama, anger, pain, love, a figure, a horse, my ideas about space. Through your eyes it again becomes an emotion or idea."

Minimal tone and purposely distorted form represents his perspective on the wealth driven and selfish personalities of Australia's richest. His unappealing depictions suggests feelings about colonial history. Indigenous man's perspective on the wealthiest people who must live polar opposite lives.

Trump; the most internationally controversial man of the present fits a similar stereotype. Simplifying and exaggerating his appearance can highlight his slimy and ugly self.

& SALA EXHIBITOR

I volunteered at Art Gallery of SA's 'Neo Teen Show' on 2 June and worked with Readitt, assisting with the charcoal drawings on paper on the floors of the gallery activity. Readitt showed me a portrait technique without needing a subject to draw.

His current work investigates anatomy, psychology and what it is like being human, with the title 'Beneath the Skin.'

INTERVIEWING: THOMAS READETT

~ WHAT IS READETT'S OPINION ON HOW TECHNIQUES CONTRIBUTE TO THE EMOTION IN PORTRAITURE & THE IMPORTANCE OF THIS?

Through painting/drawing, Readett channels and releases his own emotions, responding to experiences/challenges in his life.

His predominant style uses intensified tones which exaggerate the colours and enrich his compositions, allowing darker connotations to be expressed.

Menacing/aggressive pose implies angry which the overexposed monochrome tones extend.

The scratch-board technique is the reverse of drawing as it requires scratching for light tones instead of drawing dark tones.

Hatching/cross-hatching creates a reversed depth.

The detail of the line work determines the realism, and thus the emotion of the subject's expression. Readett illustrates different emotions depending on the technique and subject material.

"There is a point where the source photograph needs to be left behind for the portrait to become a painting."

Picasso's cubist techniques analyse the geometric forms in the face. His highly structural compositions are built up of broken shapes which is a parallel to the ever-changing feelings in the human condition.

This is a response to the bombing of Guernica (Spanish Civil War) and follows his famous Guernica painting. In a different approach to protest, he advocates the universal feeling of suffering, and human nature.

Using spatulas to create thick sporadic strokes, comedian Do brings an emotional perspective to his subjects' appearances while illustrating their unique stories.

He uses colours to symbolise emotion, eg. Blue for depression. Applying this, I have subtly captured the colourfulness of childhood and the charisma of being a young boy.

FURTHER DEVELOPING DO'S TECHNIQUE

Background negative space builds emphasis on the story beneath the face.

Difficult to achieve same broad spatula strokes at this small scale, therefore detail becomes more pointillist like Van Gogh's technique.

KEY EXPL
IN MY ST

The way that an artist applies paint to a canvas dictates how they can convey emotion. The subject's emotion is found in their facial expression and pose, whereas, the artist's feelings are translated through the painting technique and style. In portraiture, the subject's perceived psychological profile is married together with that of the artist in a collaborative undertaking.

Rembrandt's strict, orthodox and refined brush strokes contribute to his immaculate chiaroscuro modelling effects seen in his Self-portrait with a Beret and Turned-Up Collar (1659.) His style only captures the sitter's appearance like the era's version of a photograph. Also using oil but approaching realism in an alternate way, Do's large scale, colourful portraits are more emotionally expressive. In his documentary series Anh's Brush with Fame, he "gets up close and personal with Australian celebrities as he reveals hidden truths and unique insights which help shape the portrait he paints," using palette spatulas to create spontaneous, thick, arbitrary coloured strokes to liven the static emotion of the still face.¹ His unrefined strokes visualise exuberant, unrestricted movement and colour. This manipulation of vivid colour and texture reveals the subjects' feelings which he gleans from interviewing them, creating fluid and authentic portraiture which is quite natural.

Van Gogh's self-portraits liberated the genre of portraiture, acting as a 'midpoint' between the 17th century conservative classic and unrestricted 21st-century portraiture as seen below. Using contrasting, as well as complementary colours and emotionally active, fragmented stroke texture, he manifests his melancholy feelings into self-portraiture. The pinnacle of his emotive portraiture is seen in his calm, blue-toned Self-portrait (1889.) Van Gogh's pointillist style especially influenced expressionists Kirchner, Schiele and Kokoschka, who visualise aggressive and sensual feelings using similar techniques. Their avant-garde, passionate illustrations of the human condition are more captivating than previous Impressionists as a result of their exaggerated and arbitrary use of colour and texture. As 20th-century expressionists, they valued subjective emotion over objective appearance.^{2,3} The variance in colour, tone and texture is a recurrent theme in their emotive portraiture.

Like Van Gogh, de Kooning's career saw continual shifts in style and technique exploration, although, de Kooning's creations are more extreme. His thick impasto strokes built the personality of his subjects with rough texture yet fluid form, while his monochromatic charcoal sketches were comparatively simple and less engaging. His exuberant and semi-abstract Woman I-V Series (1950-2) demonstrated great emotional freedom and depth as a result of these techniques. In contrast, Picasso's multi-coloured Cubist style takes a more analytical approach to portraiture. With dramatic geometric shapes and black contours, he breaks up the face into tones, thus, separating different feelings. This tessellated technique simplifies the complex tones of the human form and focalises the emotion of weeping and suffering seen in his melancholy, yet colourful Weeping Woman (1937). The portrait captures the universal feeling of suffering as a response to the 1937 bombing of Guernica in the Spanish Civil War and this context also deepens the piece's emotion.

2017 Ramsay Art Prize finalist, Namatjira's The Richest (2016) is provocative as his cartoon-like style, and distortion techniques trivialise, yet also applauds their acclaim. His stylisation simplifies his subjects' facial expressions as his compositions capture only the bust. Also using an extensive collection of canvases and provocative themes, finalist Chandler's Heroic Painting (2016) undermines patriarchal culture. The pastel tones create an ironically gentle composition which makes up her passive-aggressive style. Both works are 'in-your-face,' and their unconventional techniques draw in their viewers discover the emotion within.

Kahlo's symbolic style directly infers her emotion. Mainly painting self-portraits, Kahlo uses imaginative surrealism to illustrate her feelings about her life's experiences with many images of body, animal and plant matter. Her Self-portrait with Thorn Necklace and Humming Bird depicts thorns literally strangling her as an expression of the pain of her several breaks in her spine, ribs and pelvis. The film Frida reveals the relationship between her art and therapy, as she expresses herself throughout the journey of her unconventional marriage and being able to walk again.⁴ During my interview with Readett, he voiced a similar opinion about using art as an outlet for his feelings and thoughts. Like Do, Readett interviews some of his subjects while he paints them. The intimate setting is stronger than painting from a photo, and proves the emotional capability of this technique. Moreover, painting from life and having a direct relationship with the sitter is a requirement of the Archibald Portrait Prize for this reason.⁵ Readett values a balance of using symbols to communicate ideas and leaving intrigue for the viewer to draw their own conclusions. His saturated tones use chiaroscuro juxtaposition of bold colours such as red and green control the work's emotional mood.

In conclusion, using a combination of arbitrary colour, large-scale, hectic brush strokes, direct symbolism, and rough and fluent texture techniques are responsible for empowering the emotion in portraiture. Painting from life broadens the extent to which feelings can be visualised as both the sitter and the artists' emotions can be channelled. The more visually exciting and eye-capturing the application of paint, the more emotionally active the portrait. Additionally, expressive freedom is more powerful than photographic realism. Readett believes, "there is a point where the source photograph needs to be left behind for the portrait to become a painting."⁶ From my study, Do and Readett stand out as emotionally expressive contemporary artists as their techniques control the emotion in their work. Both artists manipulate colour, tone and texture in alternate ways which create unique perceptions of humanity and evoke feelings in the viewer. The way that the artists' styles remain consistent throughout different subject exploration suggests that their painting techniques are representative of their own mental-psyches. By studying the works of Do's expressive predecessors as well as his own, the techniques which I have developed myself have more integrity. The legacy of Van Gogh and the German expressionists is evident in Do's established style. Despite using contrasting techniques, Do acknowledges that "the great artists [like] Rembrandt and Soutine are still giving to us... even though they left us hundreds of years ago."⁷ He has "always been fascinated by people, their dreams, desires, fears, regrets, their sadness."⁸ In this way, I have learnt that capturing more than just the subject's appearance is a common-denominator in capturing emotional expression and developing my own style.
